SWOT analysis

Strengths

- Emerging recognition of the importance of succession planning (e.g. in strategies like PAR or HRM reforms)
- Some administrations have HR structures and central civil service agencies
- Commitment to merit-based recruitment processes (e.g. Albania)
- Use of open competitions for executive roles
- Existing digital systems and registries in some cases (e.g. Kosovo*)

Opportunities

- Regional collaboration through platforms like the Seasonal School → peer learning, alignment of good practices
- Leverage digital tools and data for workforce planning, knowledge transfer, and succession maps
- Integrate succession planning in broader public administration reform and HRM strategies
- Define and standardize “talent”, “leadership” and “capacity building” across institutions
- Develop pilot initiatives at ministry or agency level to demonstrate value and build consensus

Weaknesses

- Lack of formal strategic and legal frameworks: informal practices, lack of regulation or incentives
- No clear institutional responsibilities: fragmented HRM functions, weak coordination
- Underdeveloped talent development: no shared definition of talent, leadership or capacity building
- Organizational culture not focused on continuity: replacement over development; focus on positions, not profiles
- Fragmented or non-mandatory HR planning: plans are often informal or non-obligatory, disconnected from operations

Threads

- Resistance to cultural change: institutions may stick to status quo (e.g. promotion by vacancy only)
- Risk of talent loss due to retirements or turnover without successors prepared
- Political changes may delay or disrupt institutional reform and formalization
- Without incentives or regulation, informal practices may persist indefinitely
- Lack of institutional memory if knowledge management remains unstructured

* This designation is without prejudice to positions on status, and is in line with UNSCR 1244 and the ICJ opinion on the Kosovo declaration of independence.
